

Active Commodity Management

Commodities as a group are volatile and have experienced booms and bust, marked by annual gains and losses of more than 40%¹. Moreover, commodities are not homogeneous. Individual commodity contracts have moved more independently with one another than some commonly-indexed asset classes, like stocks².

Indeed, individual commodities — energy, metals, grains and livestock — rise or fall due to the unique factors that impact their own markets. We believe a commodity strategy based on proprietary fundamental research, with the ability to vary its exposure and composition, is superior to naïve, long-only indexing.

Investment Strategy: Key Takeaways

Global Macro Freedom

Commodity Strategies Global Macro is a unique style of investing. A Global Macro viewpoint powers our understanding of how commodities impact other asset prices, such as currencies, stocks and bonds. Every portfolio position is tied to commodities, but the Fund uses its global macro freedom to find better and cheaper avenues to uncover profitable commodity exposures.

Distinguishing Portfolio Characteristics

Research and value drive composition: Unlike an index, our Fund is not stuck holding large weights in volatile energy and precious metals, regardless of value.

Hedging: Uses protective measures in an attempt to reduce risk and temper historically-high volatility of commodities.

Long and short positions: Provides flexibility to profit from the ever changing shortage and oversupply of individual commodities.
